ABSTRACT:

Medical trade cards and other advertisements promoting medical services and products were designed to directly connect patent medicine manufacturers to the consumer public. The Medical Trade Cards and Advertisements Collection contains 197 colorful trade cards, three business cards, three bi-fold brochures, one accordion brochure, and two booklets promoting medical services and products for a variety of different products, companies, physicians, and locations.

PROVENANCE:

This is an artificial collection of items which were donated to or collected by the Medical Center Archives at New York-Presbyterian/Weill Cornell Medicine at unknown dates.

ADMINISTRATIVE/BIOGRAPHICAL NOTE:

Medical trade cards and other advertisements promoting medical services and products were designed to directly connect patent medicine manufacturers to the consumer public.

At the start of the nineteenth century, the cost of seeing a physician and a fear of their treatments drove the popularity of “cure-all” patent medicines. Patent medicines, also known as proprietary medicines, were mass-produced remedies created from homemade formulas that often held no proven medicinal efficacy. Despite this, they boasted cheaper and painless cures for a wide range of ailments including cholera, tuberculosis, whooping cough, constipation, and what was then referred to as “female weakness,” among many other ailments. In the nineteenth century patent medicine manufacturers were unregulated and not required to list the active ingredients of their products. As a consequence, many products contained high volumes of alcohol mixed with ingredients such as heroin, cocaine, morphine, marijuana, and mercury.

Unlike traditional newspaper advertisements, trade cards were an innovation in advertisement due to their use of vibrant colors, the unrestricted variety of products promoted, and ease at which they were circulated to the public. Trade cards were usually available in stores and often slipped into the shopping bags of customers.

Medical trade cards often employed imagery that was meant to appeal to contemporary consumer tastes, such as flower bouquets, rosy-cheeked children, and animals. Some trade cards and other advertisements also depicted and perpetuated misogynistic sentiment, as well as negative racial and ethnic stereotypes.

As trade cards increased in popularity, a pastime of scrapbooking these cards began to grow in the United States. Advertisers took advantage of this new trend by creating distinct trade cards that were both eye catching, while also clearly demonstrating the purported medical benefits their product. The peak popularity of trade cards is estimated to have been between 1870 and 1890. By the early 1900s, mass-circulating magazines replaced trade cards as the popular form of advertising.

SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE:

The Medical Trade Cards and Advertisements Collection contains 197 colorful trade cards, three business cards, three bi-fold brochures, one accordion brochure, and two booklets promoting medical services and products for a variety of different products, companies, physicians, and locations. Of the 197 trade cards in this collection, 26 are duplicates. In addition to illustrations on the front, some trade cards also having printed information about the product on the verso. The products in the trade cards and advertisements claim to cure coughs, colds, asthma, tuberculosis, malaria, croup, constipation, sore throats, kidney stones, cholera, eczema, nervousness, balding, and what was then known as "female weakness," among many other ailments.

While the peak of trade card popularity in the United States was between 1870 and 1890, the dated trade cards in this collection range in from 1864 to 1889, while the other dated advertisements range from 1854 to 1893. The collection also includes many undated trade cards and advertisements, though they also likely fall within this date range.

The trade cards range in size from 2.10" x 3.13" to 6.15" x 3.45". The business cards range in size from 4.10" x 2.6" to 5.5" x 3.45" The bi-fold brochure range in size from 3.13" x 5.15"

(closed) and 6.25" x 5.15" (open) to 5.72" x 8.8" (closed) and 11.5" x 8.8" (open). The booklets range in size from 5.4" x 3.65" to 3.95" x 5.6" (closed) and 5.4" x 10.75" to 7.75" x 5.6" (open). The dimensions of the accordion brochure is 3.9 in x 3 in (closed) and 3.9 in x 20.75 in (open).
